Objectives

The Master's in Cultural Studies is based on theoretical knowledge and applied-research seminars.

The theory-based course unit on Cultural Studies (CS) retraces the genealogy of a particularly unique scientific culture that seeks to destabilise the humanist conception of culture, favouring instead the notion of culture in its broader, anthropological sense. This unit enables students to understand the concepts behind the theories, from those put forward by the founding fathers at the Birmingham Centre – Richard Hoggart, Raymond Williams, Edward Thompson – to Stuart Hall's model of reception theory and Paul Gilroy's concepts of migration and cultural identity. The contribution of other inspirational figures must not be overlooked, such as that made by the Italian Marxist theorist Antonio Gramsci. Nor can we ignore the influence of the French poststructuralist thinkers whose writings helped to destabilise the 'Great American Novel' thanks to French deconstructionism and the influence of hermeneutics. In the second semester this class goes on to examine developments and turning points in Cultural Studies, the influence they had and their reception in other scientific contexts - in the USA, Latin America and Europe (Spain, Portugal, Italy). The class examines the way in which other academic fields developed their own specific characteristics by drawing on and appropriating these cultural theories, which were spreading quickly by the end of the twentieth century.

Students may choose applied seminar units from the bundle of classes available within the Departments of English, Spanish, Portuguese, Italian, Literatures and the Arts. These seminar units will revolve around specific themes: postcolonial studies; art and memory; hyper-modernism; works and their audiences. They will be conducted in French with the exception of those seminar units taught by the English department.

Training content

Two years of study: Master 1 (M1) and Master 2 (M2)

In the first year of this two-year programme all students follow a common core curriculum on the theory of Cultural Studies (two hours per week). This covers Cultural Studies and the theory of Cultural Studies according to the Anglo-Saxon tradition.

In the second semester, this common core curriculum focuses on the scope and reception of these cultural theories in the linguistic and cultural fields of Spanish, Italian and Portuguese. In addition to this common curriculum students choose from several seminar units that revolve around four key axes: postcolonial studies; hyper-modernism; cultural memory and historical accounts; works and their audiences.

In Semester 3 students follow course units that are chosen from this same bundle of seminar units. They may thus concentrate their studies on the axis of their choice.

Semester 4 is reserved for the completion of a dissertation, which may be supervised either in France or abroad (see Erasmus agreements). Students should also plan to undertake an internship within a professional context (cultural associations, cinema festivals, participation in planning cultural events within the university and local associations). These internships will take the form of tutored projects.
